GREEN TIP

The United Kingdom has "almost certainly" had its hottest summer on record, according to provisional statistics from the Met Office. The mean temperature in the south and east was about 3C above the normal, with the City of London recording an average daily temperature above 28C in July (that includes night time temperatures). This is in line with evidence that summers are getting hotter and drier because of climate change.

What is notable about this summer is how long-lasting and widespread the heat has been - with temperatures widely meeting heatwave criteria on five separate occasions. Accompanying this has been significantly drier weather than the norm in the centre, south and east of the UK. Scientists are clear that climate change is making our summers hotter and drier. 9 of the last 10 summers (2016-2025) have brought temperatures above the long-term norm.

As this pattern looks set to continue we need to be thinking about how we can mitigate the effects of high temperatures on people and food production.
